The Month's news

burgeoning cost

●Blunkett admits asylum seekers will again cost over £1 billion this year

David Blunkett has admitted that the Home Office has drastically overspent its asylum budget for 2002. The allocated budget for looking after asylum seekers of £434 million has already been spent just two months into the current financial year, and the final bill for the British taxpayer is likely to reach a record £1,474 million. In the 2001-2002 financial year too, the cost of supporting asylum seekers was more than double the £403m budgeted, at just over £1billion. Speaking on BBC Radio 4's World This Weekend last month, Mr Blunkett admitted that the money allocated for asylum spending was inadequate and required "readjustment" in the light of the growing number of asylum seekers coming to Britain.

●50 al-Qaeda trained Islamic militants feared to be back in UK

British police and security services are hunting 50 al-Qaeda trained Islamic militants whom they fear could be in the UK according to a report in The Observer newspaper last month. Most are believed to be Pakistanis with dual British nationality who travelled to south Asia to join hardline jihad groups in the 'holy war' against the West and who then used their British passports to return to the UK following the collapse of the Taliban regime. Islamic leaders in Britain, such as Omar Mohamed Bakri, of the al-Muhajiroun organisation, have boasted of recruiting large numbers of British Muslims to fight with extremist groups in conflicts overseas.

A leaked MI5 assessment reveals that security service experts believe there has been "an increase in the number of Muslims in the United Kingdom who have undergone some form of military training, including indoctrination into extremist beliefs". MI5, the document says, is "concerned that the presence of returned jihad trainees in the UK may encourage the radicalisation of the British Muslim community".

●Senior police chiefs now planning to recruit black and Asian officers from abroad

Sir John Stevens, the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, has ordered his recruiting team to target black and Asian officers from countries such as India, South Africa, Bangladesh and Jamaica in a bid to help the force meet government targets for increasing the number of officers from ethnic minorities. 25% of the Met's manpower must come from ethnic groups by 2010 under targets fixed after the Stephen Lawrence inquiry. At present officers from ethnic minorities make up about 4.5 per cent. Sir John said: "I am asking our recruiting people to look at recruiting abroad and this would be similar to the NHS recruitment of medical staff and nurses. This would help with ethnic minorities .'

The face of the future?

Every regional police force in the country are under instructions to recruit more officers from ethnic minorities, and the Greater Manchester and West Midlands forces are also already actively targeting black and Asian officers .

●Eleven crimes are reported every minute in England and Wales

Eleven crimes are reported every minute in England and Wales and four people are arrested each minute, according to a first ever 'snapshot' of the criminal justice system on a single day. On the chosen day, May 1 this year, more than 16,500 crimes were reported in England and Wales, of which 3,372 were in London. "The statistics revealed by the snapshot demonstrate the sheer size of the task facing today's criminal justice system," said the Metropolitan police commissioner, Sir John Stevens.

What we have to learn from France

The significant decline in support for Jean-Marie-Le Pen's Front National in French parliamentary elections last month provided important lessons for the BNP. Why, after winning a place in the presidential runoff back in May with around 18% of the vote, did Le Pen and the FN slump to just 11% of the vote in June, ending up with no parliamentary seats? How did Jacques Chirac's centre-right coalition, after winning just a few percent more than the FN in the first round of the presidential elections, bounce back to win over 40% of the vote and a landslide majority in the parliamentary elections?

Superficially, the result was even more puzzling in light of an opinion poll published on May 28th by the French daily newspaper Le Monde. This showed that 40 % of the French electorate supported Le Pen's hard-line stance on crime. A further 35% appreciated his defence of traditional French values. And a massive 60% agreed with him that there were too many immigrants in France. So why wasn't this translated into votes for the FN just over one week later?

Some people might be misled into thinking that what doomed the FN to this drop in support was the rather sudden conversion of Chirac to FN style policies and rhetoric -particularly regarding crime and immigration- immediately after Le Pen's shock success the first round of the presidential vote. In other words, the FN lost because it had its clothes stolen by the establishment -a theory that also sustains the myth that it was Mrs Thatcher's adoption of similar tactics that doomed the old British National Front to defeat in 1979.

A closer look at the evidence, however, tells a different story. The Le Monde opinion poll of May 28th, for example, showed that while there was substantial support for Le Pen's message, a remarkable 70% of the same people viewed him as dangerous extremist posing a threat to democracy. In short, the French people clearly decided that they liked the message but not the messenger.

Contradictory? Only to the extent that one of the generally accepted reasons given for Le Pen's surprise second place a few weeks before was that the FN had run a disciplined campaign that consistently focused on the key voter issues, particularly the alarming rise in crime. Le Pen himself had also kept a relatively low profile, avoiding the confrontational rhetoric and controversial distractions which had dogged the FN's progress in the past and which had led to the damaging split with Bruno Megret and his supporters in 1999. This resulted in the nationalist right achieving its best ever vote, with Le Pen and Megret's combined scores equalling Chirac's.

All this changed after the first round, however, as Le Pen seemingly reverted to the confrontational and provocative politics of the past. Rather than calmly and rationally hammering away at the issues which had attracted so much new support, and rather than working hard to reassure the electorate that they had nothing to fear from the FN, Le Pen wasted unprecedented media air time by adding fuel to the fire of an already tense and delicate situation.

His truculent attacks on his political opponents and emotive allegations of wide ranging conspiracies against him, only helped to distract the electorate and consolidate the impression that the FN was isolated and beyond the pale - something its opponents were desperately working towards. And his careless and provocative talk about creating a 'Fortress France' and of setting up 'transit camps' for immigrants, merely played into the hands of his opponents' propaganda machine. Hence the French electorate - including many who had voted FN in the first round- decided to support a less controversial messenger. Step forward Jacques Chirac.

Recognising this reason for the FN's set back is crucial for the BNP's own growth and development. Like French nationalists, we are also now faced with a government that is putting tremendous energy into trying to steal our clothes by talking tough on asylum and crime. But rather than being concerned, we should see New Labour's rearguard action on BNP issues for what it is -a tremendous opportunity for us to catapult the BNP into the political big league.

After all, the same thing happened to the FN in France from 1986-88 and in 1993 when the then French Interior Minister Charles Pasqua tried to win back FN voters by similar means. Pasqua's efforts, however, merely served to legitimise and consolidate the FN's position and ideas in mainstream French politics, leading to further substantial growth and electoral success.

This factor was also important in the process which led to the BNP's famous council election victory on the Isle of Dogs in September 1993. Here it was the locally strong Liberal-Democrats who attempted to cling onto votes by talking tough on BNP issues such as equal housing rights for the local white population. This helped to legitimise the BNP's presence in mainstream local politics while allowing the party to gain further credibility by successfully casting doubt on the genuineness of the Lib-Dems conversion to 'rights for whites'. The BNP not only won in Millwall but became the second party across the whole borough of Tower Hamlets the following May, annihilating the Lib-Dems in the process.

Unfortunately, the then BNP leadership in 1994 was not willing or sophisticated enough to take on board and extend the local tactics that had enabled the party to make such a tremendous impact in the east-end of London. Now in 2002, in the wake of our council victories in Burnley and rising support across the country, we have the leadership and potential to go much, much further.

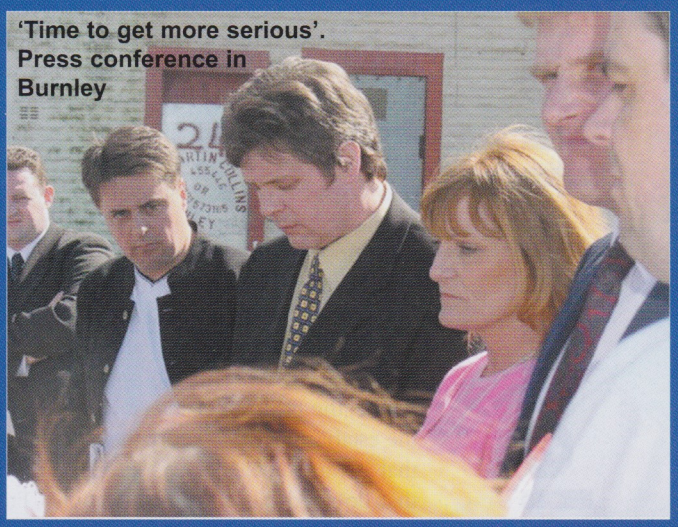

To do so we must work harder than ever in exposing Blair and Blunkett's rhetoric for what it is -empty of all honesty and substance. That while they talk tough on asylum they are planning to desecrate the countryside with scores of monster asylum centres. That while they talk tough on crime, they are overseeing an unprecedented spiralling of crimes of every nature. And we must expose these truths in a manner and with an image that completely reassures the British people that we are a mature, responsible and safe alternative. We hold our fate in our own hands.

Can you afford to wait any longer ?

NICK GRIFFIN examines how much the BNP has grown but reminds us what we will be losing if we don't go much further more quickly

"Tony Blair isn't just another bad Prime Minister. He and his appalling wife are the key players in a left-fascist coup d'etat which has seized control of our country. We're much further down the road to dictatorship and a police state than most people realise. The Tories don't even know what's hit them, let alone have any clue about what to do to turn things around. They're too scared of the BBC to stand up for our freedom or even our future existence as a nation."

This was the key point in a very interesting email from one of our many recent recruits. A professional man in his fifties, he was a lifelong Conservative active until the last European election, when he stood as a candidate for the UK Independence Party. Like a number of other new members coming on board at the moment, he was attracted to the UKIP by its anti-EU stand, but has since become disillusioned by the abject refusal of its increasingly liberal-dominated leadership to address other key issues, particularly asylum-seeking, the creeping Islamification of our cities, and the failure of the liberal 'elite' to take crime seriously.

'Time to get more serious'. Press conference in Burnley

Blair fascism

Our new friend is not alone in having seen the Big Picture about the Prime Minister and her husband Tony. Look at the ruthless demolition job of our national and personal freedoms and identity carried out by New Labour, its media allies and its flunkies within the managerial class in every British institution, from the police to the Boy Scouts, the fire brigade to the legal system. Watch the filth that spews out on children's TV, or listen to Radio 1. Wake up and smell the fish rotting from the head down!

We've seen the replacement of the un-elected peers with un-elected Blairite toadies. We've got senior policemen and government ministers whose sordid homosexual lifestyles actually serve to camouflage the even more sordid details of their schemes to encourage the use of socially destructive drugs or the legalisation of paedophilia. Blair and his cronies hobnob with IRA bombers and put them into power over the Protestants they want to ethnically cleanse and the innocent Catholics they have terrorised, beaten and tortured for decades.

Anyone who opposes these trends is denounced as a 'hater', an 'extremist' or even a 'racist' - a term invented by the mass murderer Leon Trotsky as a means of demonising both inconvenient facts of human nature and political opponents. The Labour party spin machine allied itself with the convicted criminal Gerry Gable and the corrupt pornographer and newspaper mogul Richard Desmond to break the law on a massive scale in a failed bid to keep the BNP from winning council seats. The Prison Service is headed by an open left-fascist who boasts of his plans to sack good officers for daring to support the BNP - or any other party with which he disagrees.

Even non-political single-issue pressure groups such as the Hatfield Rail Crash Survivors are targeted for investigation and smears in an attempt to stifle any dissent or criticism. A father is made an example of in a high-profile court case for daring to beat up the drug-pusher who got his two young sons hooked on heroin. Students are threatened with expulsion for flying the Cross of St. George or the Union Flag.

Destroying our freedom

We're the most spied-upon, browbeaten, cowed people in the world, and still they haven't finished with us. Soon the political police will have the right to see every single email every one of us has ever sent. Sweeping new 'anti-discrimination' laws are going to force companies to hand over even more of our jobs to even more foreigners. Our 'innocent until prove guilty' tradition and right to trial by jury is to be replaced by a system were you are guilty until a state-appointed judge decides you are innocent.

Local government boundaries that stretch back a thousand years, and the remnants of a local democracy which arose as our forefathers fought for their political rights, are about to be swept away in order to 'regionalise' England out of existence and centralise even more power in the hands of party bureaucrats. Our children and housing estates are to be forcibly 'integrated'- i.e. turned into corners of Pakistan.

The industries on which our national freedom was based - coal, fishing, steel, farming, manufacturing - have been declared obsolete and are now in the final stages of elimination. Within a couple of years the destruction of the last vestiges of our right to choose a government which runs our economy on lines which suit us will be complete when we are forced - on pain of starvation - to hand over our Pound in exchange for Euro occupation currency.

The endless list of New Labour destructiveness and evil is neither a matter of coincidence or incompetence; what is going on is both systematic and deliberate. Tony Blair disguised his much-vaunted Project as the 'Third Way'; its real name is the 'Destruction of Britain'. We are not living under a Government, we are being subjected to a Revolution.

So what are we going to do about it? Well, to a large extent, this depends on you. The British National Party has matured and grown tremendously in recent years, but we've only just begun the long, difficult process of building the power-winning political, social, cultural and economic organisation which is the only thing which can stop and reverse the Politically Correct/Euro-fascist revolution.

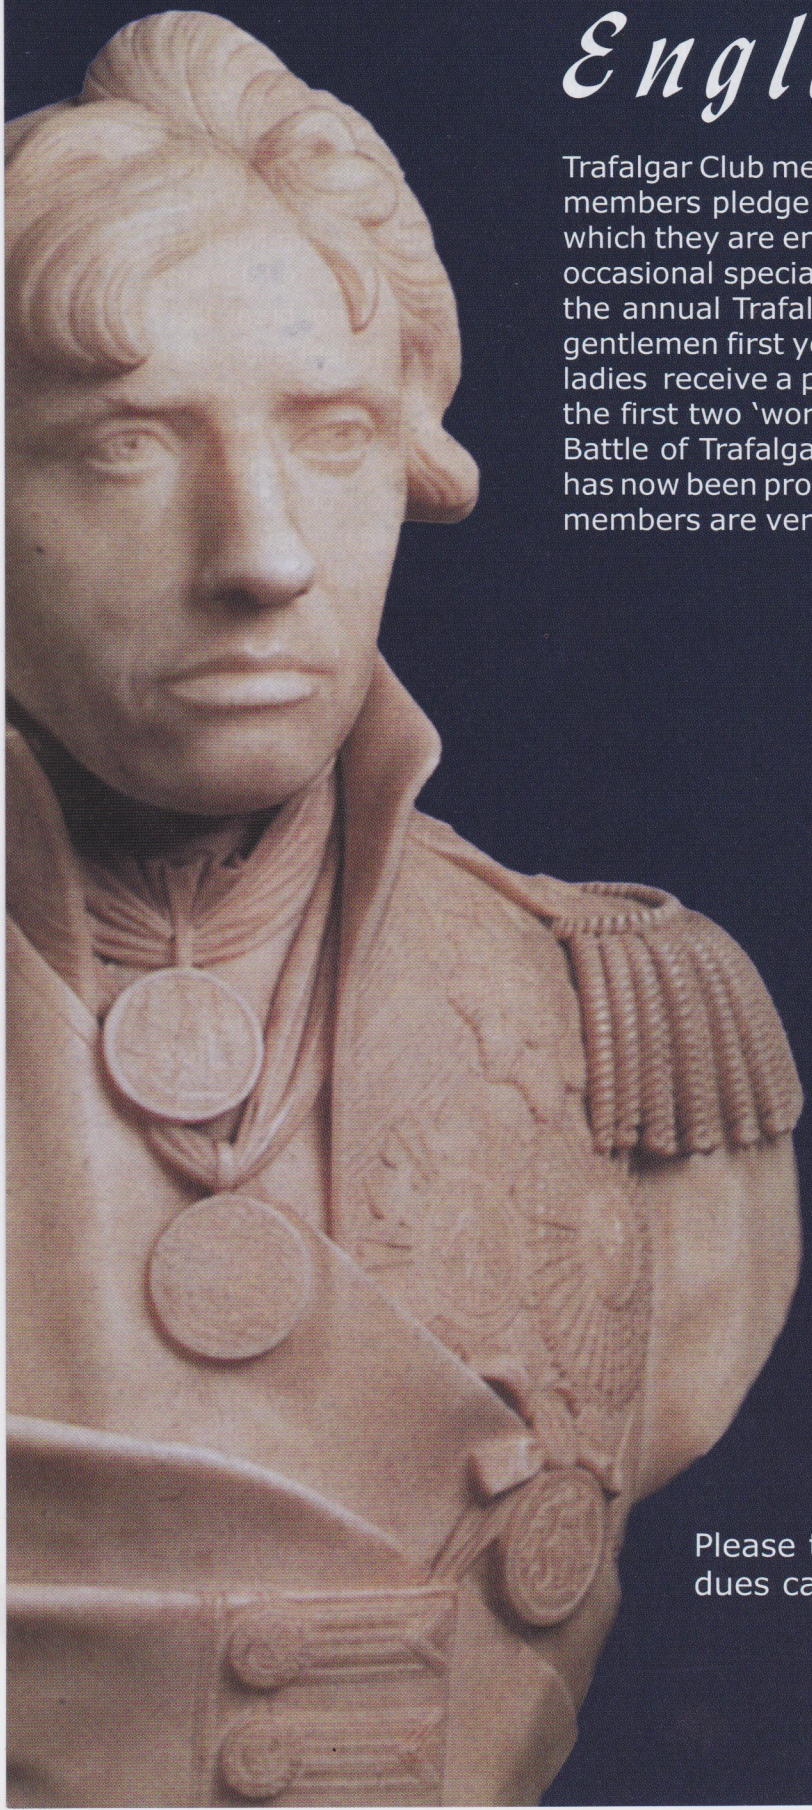

The enemy we face cannot be defeated by voting for a Conservative party which sold the pass on all the essentials years ago. We will not win back our stolen freedoms by joining civil liberties groups. We will not stop the asylum flood by listening to David Blunkett talking about televising half-a-dozen deportations. We will not break the alliances between corrupt government and super criminals, or the love-hate relationship between the bureaucrats of Welfarism and the feckless and helpless underclass their system has created by voting in a few Save Our Hospital councillors. We will not stop the destruction of what is left of British industry by blaming militant trade unions while turning a blind eye to the far worse impact of globalisation and spending share dividends on cheap Chinese imports. We will not stop our children becoming an oppressed minority in their own homeland even by voting in a few BNP councillors.

We can only oppose the multiculti/Europhile coup by building a revolutionary counter-balance of our own. The time to conserve, the time for a conservative party, is long gone. There is nothing left to conserve. The Britain we knew and loved, the Britain for which our fathers and grandfathers fought, is nothing more than a memory. "All that is necessary for the triumph of evil is that good men do nothing" is not a warning for the far future but our epitaph - and it is being etched onto our national gravestone by the poisoned bile of creatures like Tony Blair, Alistair Campbell, Oliver Letwin and Greg Dyke even as you read this.

Revolution - even a pseudo-legal, superficially peaceful one like Blair's - can only be over-turned by a counter-revolution. That counter-revolution requires a revolutionary party. And a revolutionary party can only be built by revolutionaries - not wild-eyed cranks with dangerous, unachievable foreign fantasies, but men and women who have made the decision to dedicate their lives to achieving the political power needed to save the land and people we love.

Trafalgar Club

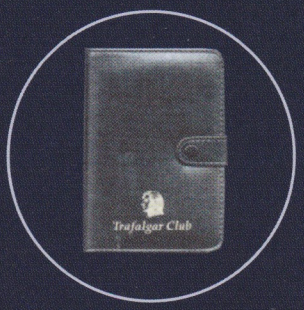

England Expects

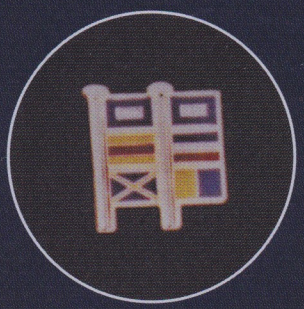

Trafalgar Club members make a real difference to the BNP! It's members pledge a minimum of £15 per month, in return for which they are entered into a prize draw every month, receive occasional special intenal bulletins, and are entitled to attend the annual Trafalgar Club dinner free of charge. In addition, gentlemen first year members receive a Trafalgar Club tie (a), ladies receive a personalised organiser file (b). The tie carries the first two 'words' of Nelson's semaphore signal before the Battle of Trafalgar - "England Expects." A fine enamel badge has now been produced for second year members (c), and new members are very welcome too.

Transforming the BNP

Fortunately, the British National Party already includes enough of these true British patriots to have made a start on the long road ahead. But we can't do it all ourselves. In order to build the democratic, peaceful mass movement which is the only thing which can block and Blair's tide of destruction we need far more people like you involved.

At present we have about one hundred active local groups and branches, to win we need ten thousand. At present our decentralised 'virtual headquarters' has thirty people working for it. A couple of years ago we had just five, but in a couple of years time we'll need a hundred. In the election campaign just gone we outfought the old parties in a few wards and matched the far-left smear merchants in all 68 in which we stood. Next May we'll outfight the old parties in several dozen wards and we'll leave the far-left way behind as we push well into triple figures. At present we distribute something like 25,000 copies of our newspaper each issue, to make a real impact we need to sell at least 100,000 every time. At present the BNP is close to doubling in size in just one year - before we win we'll need to grow at five or six times that rate.

Those targets may look like a tall order, but look at it this way: There's nothing in that list which involves us doing things we don't already do, nothing which is beyond the reach of ordinary people with just a bit of drive, initiative and good old fashioned British grit.

And the wonderful thing is that, in many ways, we've done the hardest part already. A few years ago, before we made the BNP a household name, there wasn't a single local council seat we could have won anywhere in the country. Now there are hundreds, probably thousands, of seats which are winnable. Not without hard work, but that hard work can be done by just three or four people who are prepared to put in a couple of evenings a week into putting out local leaflets, knocking on doors, and helping their neighbours with the problems and frustrations that the other parties only care about at election time. Will you be one of those three or four near you? Or design their regular ward newsletter for them? Or pay for it? Or give us a standing order to help pay for the extra staff we need to manage the growing national operation without which such local efforts would mean nothing? You see, there's something that everyone can do, no matter who you are or where you live.

Your choice

A few years ago we overwhelmingly recruited young lads who had never been involved in politics before. We still do - and this new blood is essential both to our party and to the survival of popular democracy - but we are also now signing up men and women who are already political activists. Some come from the Labour party - disgusted at the way in which it has turned its back on the British working man and his communities. Others come from the Conservatives - disgusted at the way they have turned their backs on traditional family values and the crime epidemic. Others come from the minor parties - disgusted at the way parties like UKIP haven't the courage or the vision to turn their eyes from their old hobbyhorses and to speak out also against the evils engulfing our society.

Every activist we take from another party is doubly important, because their joining us weakens one of our opponents even as it strengthens us. And it strengthens us all the more when the newcomers come to understand that the common Cause we now share is more than just another party. This is a Crusade, the first stages in the Last Battle which is destined to sweep to and fro over the entire continent of Europe in the next twenty-five years.

At the end of that time we - the native peoples of the ancient free nations of the greatest civilisation in history - will either face a new era proud and free once again, or we will hang our heads in shame as we stand in chains in the ruins of all we hold dear.

By the very act of having come across this article - whether because you are a regular reader, or because you are a curious new enquirer, or by what the soul-dead materialist would call 'chance' - and have read and agreed with what is written here, you are now part of this historic movement.

The only question that remains is whether you will hang around on the fringe, pretending to be involved, or whether you will play your full part in the great drama of these days of decision. It is a question that each one of us is asked. You may think of your children and grandchildren as you answer for yourself.

Blazing a Trail

Halley's comet in full flight

Stephen MacDonald remembers the great British astronomer, Edmund Halley

The night sky provided our ancient ancestors with an endless source of fascination, mystery, fear and awe. Today astronomy is enjoyed by thousands of amateur enthusiasts nationwide and heavenly phenomena such as eclipses, meteors and planetary alignments still tease the popular imagination.

Great Britain has played a huge role in the unmasking of the secrets of the skies and this month we look at one of our scientific giants; astronomer, map-maker, mathematician and inventor Edmund Halley.

The son of a wealthy London soap-maker, also called Edmund, Halley was born in 1656. He was 10 at the time his father's business was devastated in London's Great Fire, but being a man of means he was able to fund his son's education. The young Edmund was a boy genius and at the age of 15 he was captain of St. Paul's school in London and constructed a dial which monitored the passage of stars across the night sky.

He was just 17 when he enrolled at Queen's College Oxford in 1673, and began working with John Flamsteed, the Astronomer Royal, assisting him with observations both at Oxford and at the newly opened splendour of the Royal Observatory in Greenwich.

Mapping the night sky

While Flamsteed was busy mapping the stars of the northern hemisphere the young Halley had a burning ambition to map the stars of the southern hemisphere. His ambition was pioneering as the southern hemisphere at that time was largely unmapped by Britain in particular and other "Empire building" western European nations in general. Halley's desire to map the night sky of these uncharted realms captured the imagination of the Royal Court of King Charles II and many influential people including the President of the Royal Society and the master of the East India Company. It was the latter who provided a ship for Halley and his companions to travel to the southern most point in the early British Empire, the isolated island of St. Helena, 1000 miles west of the Southern African coast.

Although the weather during much of his eighteen month journey made nocturnal observations impossible, he was able to make improvements to the sextant which was then the main method of sea-faring navigation. He also collected data which allowed him to expand theories about how the tides work and how the trade winds blow across the Atlantic Ocean, a discovery which was to have a profound effect on the development of the colonies in southern Africa and the Americas.

Halley returned to England in 1678 and published his catalogue, the very first known record of southern hemisphere stars. This would later be of use to explorers who opened up Australia, New Zealand and Antarctica.

Although he didn't graduate from Oxford he found himself with the reputation of one of Britain's leading astronomers. Honours quickly came his way. He became a graduate of Oxford University on 3 December 1678 without taking the examinations, the degree being conferred on the command of King Charles II. He was also elected a member of the Royal Society in November 1678 becoming, at the age of 22, one of its youngest ever Fellows.

Intellectual freedom fighter

Halley was also a non-conformist and intellectual pioneer. He embraced the notion that nothing should be dogmatically applied unless it was tested and proven. The British Isles had a few decades earlier witnessed a Civil War largely over religious issues and for the vast majority of the population the Bible was taken literally. When in 1691 a vacancy for the coveted Savilian Chair of Astronomy at Oxford arose, Halley was keen to apply. His former friend John Flamsteed voted against Halley informing the Court at Oxford that Halley would ".....corrupt the youth of the university" ... with his non-conformist beliefs. How history repeats itself! Real pioneers and heroes being slandered by dogmatists but who are later proven to be correct; Halley in 1691 and over 300 years later the men and women of the British National Party who dare to speak the unutterable truth are slandered by the forces of the establishment.

Halley's other achievements were to assist his contemporary Isaac Newton with the publication of Principia, the definitive work on the movement of celestial bodies. Halley corrected Newton's proofs and largely funded its publication for which Newton was eternally grateful.

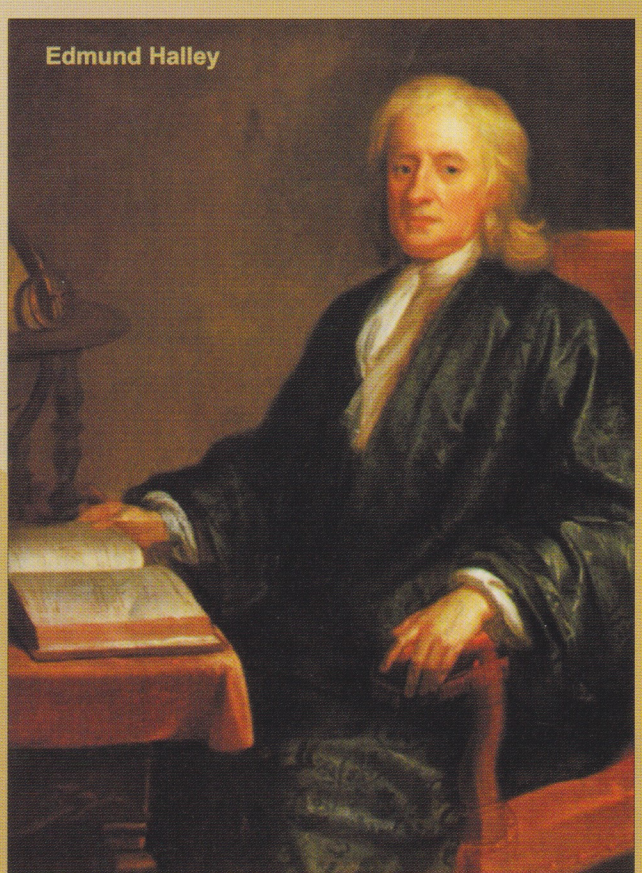

Weather forecasts are today taken for granted but in Halley's time an understanding of weather patterns was very primitive. He constructed the very first meteorological chart showing prevailing wind directions across the entire known world. In 1693 his creative genius and eagerness for research and study propelled him to produce a pioneering work; the first ever mortality table which he carried out for the Silesian city of Breslau in 1693. It was one of the earliest works to relate mortality and age in a population and was highly influential in the future production of actuarial tables in life insurance.

Halley's Comet

From around 1695 Halley made a careful study of the orbits of comets. Once thought to be the heralds of fire, famine and disaster comets have been observed for millennia. Using mathematical theory Halley calculated that the comet seen in Europe in 1682 was the same object seen in 1531, and 1607 and in 1305, 1380, and 1456. In 1705 he published his prediction that it would return in 76 years, claiming that it would appear in December 1758. Although Halley had been dead for fifteen years by 1758, he achieved lasting fame when the comet was observed on 25 December 1758. This comet was named in his honour.

As well as inventing the diving bell which allowed himself and four others to stay submerged for 90minutes at a depth of 60ft, Halley also pioneered the first mobile device for determining longitude at sea by means of lunar observations.

Edmund Halley was a man of principle, honour and a genius. A true British hero, his ideas have benefited Mankind as a whole. We in the BNP will be doing out utmost to ensure that the memory of our great ancestors like Halley live on forever.

IDENTITY interviews Burnley BNP councillor TERRY GROGAN

id:Terry, like several other Burnley BNP candidates, you served for many years in the armed forces and more specifically in the Parachute Regiment. Can you tell us a little bit about your experiences?

TG: I served for five years with 3 Para and travelled extensively around the world, seeing active service in Northern Ireland and the Falklands, as well as spending time in Oman and Canada. I initially joined the paras mainly for excitement and adventure, but the main things I have taken from the experience are a strong sense of identity, loyalty and comradeship with the men I served with. We have regular reunions.

id:What action did you see during the Falklands War?

TG: We were first on the islands, landing at St. Carlos Bay. We then embarked on the long march across land until we reached Mount Longdon. The battle for the mountain raged for about 2 days until the Argentinians finally surrendered. We had then captured the heights overlooking Port Stanley and from then on it was just a question of time.

id: What was the most unforgettable experience of the war for you?

TG: Coming home without 44 of my friends and comrades from 3 Para. Young men, some only 18, who didn't return.

id: What did you do when you got home?

TG: I stayed with the pares for a short time but we were hit by severe government cutbacks and I felt in any case that it was time to move on after the war. I became self-employed and went to work in Germany for three years. But when I came back to the UK I was classed as a 'Non-Habitual Resident' because I had been out of the country for more than 14 months. I was told that I wasn't entitled to any social security or pension rights and would have to rely on the help of family and friends! I literally would have been better off if I had returned without a name and number -or as an asylum seeker. Anyway, I am now established as a production manager in a local plastics factory.

Councillor: Terry Grogan

id: What about hobbies?

TG: I used to be a semi-professional footballer for Clitheroe and I am still an avid supporter of Burnley FC. But like many other football league clubs Burnley has been hit hard by the collapse of ITV digital. losing an estimated £3 million.

id: How did your interest in politics develop?

TG: To be honest I was never that interested in politics but was forced to become interested by what I saw happening here in Burnley with all the injustice and discrimination against local Burnley people. My initial political motivation was primarily Burnley in origin.

id: How did you become involved with the BNP?

TG: About two years ago a friend of mine asked me to go along to a meeting and listen to what was being said. What I heard was exactly what I was thinking and feeling. The BNP was like a breath of fresh air to me. I have also been impressed with Nick Griffin who is obviously a very intelligent man. He recently spoke in Burnley and I was really surprised about he breadth of his political knowledge and insight. He spoke for about 2 hours and never lost the thread once.

Are people like us...

id: Was it a difficult decision for you to decide to put your name forward as a candidate?

TG: It was a serious decision to make because of my work and family commitments. But once I make decision to do something then I always like to follow it through to the best of my ability. Also, all the candidates were extremely lucky to receive such tremendous support from the Burnley and Pendle branch of the BNP.

The other key thing for me was that I was a local man standing locally. This is absolutely crucial to the BNP winning more seats in Burnley and elsewhere. We have to stand local people who are known, liked and respected. And we have to do this on a much bigger scale starting next year.

id: How did you feel when it became clear you had won your seat?

TG: Well I wasn't actually at the final declaration on the Friday because I had to work. When I was told I felt very excited but also realised that I had a massive job to do for the people who voted for me and the BNP. The media frenzy that we were then subjected to was an unbelievable experience but I believe we have helped to break the ice and from now on it will be easier for us and the party. This is another reason the BNP has to field so many more candidates starting next year. It will also reduce the pressure in key areas.

id: How have Burnley people reacted to you becoming a councillor?

TG: 100% positive. Really, I've not had a single negative reaction. I've had policemen coming up and shaking my hand to offer congratulations. I've had professional people stopping me and saying how it's about time and so forth. That's all I've had from Burnley people from all walks of life.

id: What has life as a BNP councillor been like so far?

TG: It's been a massive learning experience. We went in blind, we had no advise or any real help. But we have learned so much in such a short time and we are growing in confidence. The newness fear has now gone. I have a full workload every day which is extremely time consuming but at the same time very fulfilling. You have to do it. They are just waiting for us to slip up and we are just not going to let it happen.

They were waiting for 3 knuckle dragging boneheads to walk into the council chamber and they got three articulate people. Quite a surprise I'm telling you.

We have now created our own BNP community office and surgery and this is the key to our continued success: we have to start getting things done and start repaying the trust that local Burnley people have put in us id: How much more successful do you think the BNP can become in Burnley?

TG: The name 'BNP' was whispered before the elections but now people are openly supporting us. We need to keep showing that we can keep making a positive difference on local issues. So many people have said to me that they have been trying for years to get things done or improvements made and the BNP comes along and sorts them out in a few days.

And at the moment there are only three of us. The real difference will come when there are 22 of us - and that's not beyond the realms of possibility. If people see us doing things then we'll increase our support next year. It could happen so quickly. We could very quickly end up having 22 seats and being in control of Burnley Council.

id: What's the most important thing to you about being a BNP councillor?

TG: Because I love this town of Burnley where I am from, and I want to see political justice, equality and democracy grow here. People like David Blunkett called me and other BNP candidates 'Nazis' before the elections because we dared to stand up for the rights of people. Now they are having to speak our language because they realise people are demanding justice and fairness. Stuart Caddy the Labour leader of Burnley council has now said on the radio that 'we have to give other areas of Burnley a fairer share of funding.' He wouldn't have said this without the BNP. We have already done a job and now we will be finishing it. We will be the voice of the 30% of Burnley who voted BNP and we will be doing everything possible to extend that percentage next year.

Thank you councillor Grogan and the very best of luck.

SELLING THE BNP

LARRY NUNN argues that the adoption of a modern sales strategy to transform revenue generation is essential if the BNP is to achieve its ambitions

Imagine . . .

Imagine a week day evening in late summer.
The scene is a suburban street, in a predominantly white area, anywhere in Britain. A car pulls up by the side of the road and out steps a smartly dressed man carrying a brief case containing sales literature and a smart leather presentation binder. He knocks at the door of one of the houses and after introducing himself to the occupant, is let in.

Our man is a salesman and like all good salespeople he is a professional, earning a comfortable living that enables him to provide for his family, all the normal creature comforts that families of professional working people would normally expect.

Our salesman has been with his current organisation for just over three years and by maintaining an average of just two sales per week, he is now grossing £2,220 per month, equivalent to over £26,000 per year.

The difference between this salesman and the vast majority of other salespeople however is his product and the organisation he represents. The logo embossed on his leather presentation binder gives it away - it bears the letters "BNP". His product is a simple promise, a promise of justice, security and democracy - that the British People will one day be free!

Our man is not as you might think, alone in his endeavours. He is just one of an elite corps of over 500 highly trained professional salespeople covering all of the British Isles.

He is not afraid, as countless others had been afraid in earlier times that his dedication to our party and his full time political campaigning will damage his career or lose him his job. On the contrary, his dedication and the long hours he spends working to promote British nationalism make his job more secure, increase his earnings and win him plaudits from his boss. Our man is a serious professional, selling a serious product professionally

THE PROBLEMS THUS FAR:

The BNP is growing and attracting increasing numbers of good quality recruits, but we are still not growing fast enough and not as fast as we could if we adopted the "sales" strategy outlined in this article.

The problems that we face can be summarised as follows;

- Our activists are mainly part-time activists and consequently, activity levels are relatively low;

- Those members who possess the qualities that would make them ideal organisers or election candidates are predominantly deterred from volunteering their services, for fear of damaging their careers or job security; and we currently lack the financial resources that the old political parties enjoy.

NEED FOR FULL-TIME ACTIVISTS

Across the country, the current activity levels of even our most committed activist are relatively low. In the main, these activists can only operate on a part time basis, as the Party is unable to employ more than a handful of people as full time activists.

Once our activists have done a full days work and attended to personal and family needs, there is precious little time left to organise and attend meetings, conduct leafleting or follow-up enquiries.

CAREER & JOB SECURITY

Our membership is made up of a cross section of the British public, and while most are happy to donate money, attend meetings, and do a bit of leafleting, only a few can take up high profile positions that will expose them to the spotlight of publicity or make them well known for their allegiance to our cause.

The individuals who find public campaigning most difficult are those in the professions, the forces and in managerial positions, especially if their role is customer facing in a sales or public relations capacity.

Many people employed in such positions are subject to clauses in the rules of their professional bodies, or in their contracts of employment, that prevent them from behaving "in a manner" that may "damage the reputation of", or bring "into disrepute" their professional body or their employer. It would be very easy for an unsympathetic employer to maintain that an employed BNP member's political activities are in breach of such a clause.

The consequence of this is that the very people who would normally make ideal party officials and ideal election candidates, the people who's present occupations demonstrate that they have many of the attributes and competencies required, are disproportionately deterred from volunteering their services.

NEED FOR MORE FINANCIAL RESOURCES

In mounting a general election campaign, the Labour Party spends in excess of £10m and the Conservatives, in excess of £15m. Combined with the free publicity afforded them by the mass media, these immense sums have been a major factor in ensuring that small parties have up to now been unable to dent their dominance of our political system.

The BNP must find a way to marshal financial resources on a similar scale if we are to win control of or country and save our people from misery and ruin. And If we are to do this, we can no longer rely on collections and the small membership fee currently charged to our members. Nor can we rely solely on the growing number of patriots that currently make regular contributions to the Trafalgar Club.

THE PARADOX:

Without political success for the BNP, most people will suffer an increasingly gloomy future as we indigenous British eventually become a minority in our own land and ultimately become a persecuted minority facing extinction.

Worrying about one's career prospects or job security today therefore, and refraining from engaging in unrestrained political campaigning, seems at first sight, somewhat trite to say the least and the few brave souls who have already forsaken their careers to campaign vigorously and openly, can with some justification decry the lack of courage displayed by others. To do so however, is to miss a most important point.

When salvation is a long way off and when potential activists have families to support and spouses whose commitment and resolve may not be as strong as their own, most of them choose security today over salvation in the future. In essence, the dangers we face however predictable now, are still for most of our people, an intangible threat that have still to materialise to their full horror..

ALIGNMENT OF INTERESTS

As a party, if we are to win the whole hearted active support of significant numbers of increasingly numerous high quality supporters, then we need to provide a means by which those potential activists can forge a secure and rewarding career in British nationalism to replace their existing one..

We need to provide them with the means by which they can, today, earn a living comparable to that which they might otherwise enjoy by keeping their heads down. In short, we need to directly align the interests of our movement with the interests of our activists.

We do not at present have the resources to employ large numbers of activists, but could this be because as a party, we have not had sufficient belief in the value of our "product" to ask our people to pay the higher price required that would enable us to afford to employ those activists?

THE PARADOX RESOLVED?

On the one hand, we believe that our cause is so crucial to the future well being and survival of the British People that our members should by prepared to risk their careers to fight for salvation, but on the other hand, we do not believe that our people value our "product" enough to pay more than £25 a year for it! When we start to believe that the "product" we sell is so valuable, so necessary and so crucial, that every single one of our people will gladly be prepared to pay much, much more than £25 a year to have it, then we will have resolved the paradox and our movement will take a giant leap forward!

THE PROMISE:

The establishment parties make all sorts of promises in their election manifestos, of higher standards of this and that, and they repeatedly fail to deliver. For this reason, our people resent paying taxes and are usually only prepared to pay nominal sums for the privilege of membership of those old parties.

However, we are not simply promising lower fuel prices or slightly increased spending on education, we are offering the British People an alternative to their inevitable ruin! Shouldn't we expect them to be prepared to pay significantly more for that?

The "product" we are selling is one of Freedom, Security, Identity and Democracy. In essence however, it is a promise of salvation and deliverance that step by step, year by year, the British People will be free and through that freedom, we will secure their future survival and prosperity.

For our promise to have real value, and for it to command the kind of financial commitment that we must demand of our supporters if we are ever to win, we must be able to demonstrate how we will obtain the resources that these victories will require.

The solution outlined below provides us with a plan that shows precisely how we can acquire the resources that we need. It shows us how we will afford to recruit a large number of high quality full-time activists who will no longer fear the financial consequences of high profile campaigning and who will constitute the bulk of our local party officials and election candidates. Outlined below is a radical form of self-funding political activism!

THE SOLUTION:

The financial services industry provides the public with products that invariably involve their customers parting with substantial amounts of money today, for benefits that will not be enjoyed for many years to come. These intangible, deferred gratification products are regarded by professional salespeople as the hardest products to sell.

Despite this however, some financial services companies have been able to build large sales-forces, composed of highly professional, high earning sales people, and have created a fortune for their shareholders in so doing.

If we can build a sales-force modelled on these successful financial services sales-forces, the salespeople concerned will become our highly professional, hard-core party activists, earning a good living, while at the same time building branches, organising meetings and demonstrations, and distributing our literature. They will also generate large amounts of income for our party and provide the resources that will enable us to fight a general election on equal terms with the establishment parties.

THE MODEL SALES ORGANISATION

The most successful financial services organisations employ sales-forces based on the following principles:

- The products sold incur deductions to finance the administration of the product and the distribution process.

- The product is distributed by rigorously selected, high quality, commission earning, self-employed salespeople.

- The salespeople are managed by tiers of self-employed sales managers who are not only able to monitor and motivate their sales teams, but are able to transfer skills and develop the abilities of their salespeople.

- The regular contributions derived from sales are collected automatically by direct debit or bankers order mandate.

- Sales confer the right to a commission income for the salesperson involved and over-ride commissions for the sales managers above them, for as long as the regular contributions are paid.

HOW THIS COULD WORK IN PRACTICE

In practical terms, the sales force could be established as follows:

- A project group will need to be set up to identify an initial nucleus of individuals who possess the competencies necessary for success in a sales management role. The project group leader will report directly to the Party Chairman.

- The project group will determine a salesperson / sales management selection, training and appointment process that will be assessment based.

- Individuals will be selected for appointment as salespeople in each region of the country. These people may be the current Regional Managers of the party but not necessarily. They could potentially however, become the eventual Regional Recruitment Managers of our sales organisation.

- The people appointed in this way would be the first Recruitment Activists (RAs) and would initially continue to maintain their current occupations, doing their work for the party in the evenings and at weekends. Their initial task will be to visit our existing members and potential members in their region, and to sell Patriotic Contribution Plans (PCPs).

The PCP is an agreement to make regular monthly donations to the BNP by bankers order. This plan entitles the contributor to full membership of the Party; an annual subscription to Identity magazine and an annual subscription to Voice of Freedom.

The amount of each monthly contribution will be a minimum of £15 per month, but could be for whatever higher amount the member is willing and able to afford.

Each PCP sold will generate an income stream for the party and as each monthly contribution is paid, this will entitle the RA to a percentage of that amount as a commission. In this way each PCP sold will also create an income stream for the RA who sold the plan.

Over a period of months, each RA will accumulate sales and the cumulative income stream derived from those sales will grow to a point where it will constitute a living wage. At this point, the RA will be required by the Party to resign from their old job and begin working full-time for the BNP.

In addition, they will be required to put forward further candidates in their region for selection as RAs. Once appointed, these new RAs will be managed in the field by the original RA, who will be promoted to the rank of Area Recruitment Manager (ARM).

The ARM will continue to make their own personal sales but will also earn an override commission on all the sales made by RAs under their management.

Once an ARM has recruited a team of say, eight people, they will be required to train one or more of the RAs within their team to take on the ARM role and to recruit another tier of RAs beneath them. In this way the ARM will achieve promotion to Regional Recruitment Manager (RRM) status and their team will be divide between the RAs they have trained up and who will then be appointed as ARMs.

In this way a pyramid sales management structure could be created, composed of; a National Recruitment Manager (NRM); 8 RRMs; 64 ARMs; and 512 RAs; making 585 full-time party activists of Parliamentary candidate quality.

BENEFIT TO THE PARTY:

The organisational benefit to our party of acquiring almost 600 highly motivated, full-time party activists is obvious and cannot be overestimated.

The whole project would require only a small outlay to get the initial project of the ground. From that point onwards, the project would be self-financing and would bring about an immediate financial benefit in the form of an income stream that would continually grow.

If each RA recruits just eight new £30 per month contributors each month, they will after five years have recruited a total of 480 contributors each, and will have created for the Party, a net income stream of over £9,000 per month each.

CONCLUSION:

We are not a political party like the establishment parties whose success or failure merely adds to the CV of the career politicians that compose them. Success or failure for us will mean more than the difference between whether or not we have cheaper butter or slightly higher old age pensions. Success or failure for us means the difference between the survival or destruction of our people and culture.

The establishment parties and the governments they form, exercise power by virtue of the financial resources they have at their disposal. These financial resources are obtained by regularly collecting a financial contribution from all the people under their control, in the form of taxes.

If we are to succeed in saving the British people we must behave as if we were the de facto government of the Free British fighting a war against the forces of Captive Britain. Any responsible government in such a position would expect it's subject to contribute more than just £25 per annum to the exchequer, after all, the government of Captive Britain obtain much more per capita from their subjects.

We are leading our people in a battle for their very survival and we must expect more of them. We must begin to expect them to contribute substantial amounts on a regular basis if we are to generate the revenue necessary to win that battle.

STAFF SUPPORT FUND

Regular investment helping to build a professional party

You may already be aware that, rather than an old-fashioned headquarters building, the BNP operates a 'virtual headquarters', with the individuals who run our national operation based in different parts of the country and in regular contact with each other. Some of these head office staff are paid full-time or part-time, while others have jobs which allow them to do their national BNP work on a reimbursements only basis.

Unavoidably, this operation costs a lot of money, and in order to cope with - and sustain - our present rapid growth, we are adding another five people to our national team, which now involves a remarkable 29 people. They include our first ever full-time regional organiser - in London - extra administration staff and a vital Councillors Support Team in Burnley.

If we fail to expand in this way we would choke on our own success, but it's an expensive step to take. So in order to make it sustainable, we are taking up some generous members and supporters on offers they've already made to start investing regular amounts by Standing Order to help to meet the cost of this essential and very welcome expansion.

This scheme is to be called the Staff Support Fund, and we urge everyone with a bank account to join this if you can possibly afford it. Subscribers will receive a regular quarterly bulletin full of 'inside news' explaining the sort of difference the Fund is making. The minimum monthly payment is £10, with a recommended amount of £5 a week/ £20 a month. This is a sum which will make a significant difference to our ability to keep on expanding, but which - at much less than £1 a day - won't break the bank.

If you are really interested in seeing the BNP grow then please call 0870 7576 267 or write to PO Box 14, Welshpool, Powys SY21 OWE and find out how you can set up a Standing Order account for the party's Staff Support Fund. We're on a roll now and we can keep it going - with your help!

A Jewel in the Heart of England

Identity reports from the beautifully unspoiled Hawkstone Park and Follies in Shropshire

Taking in one of Hawkstone Park's stunning views

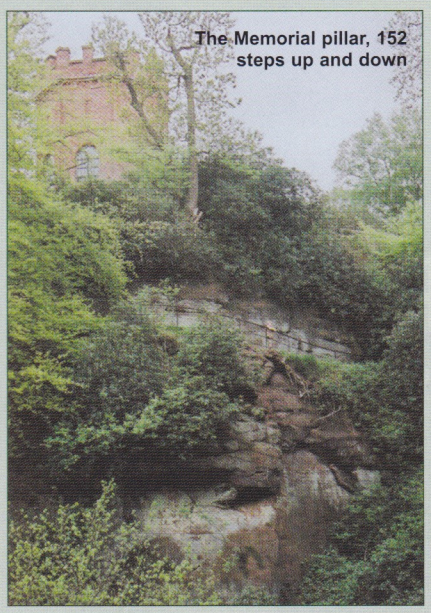

According to ancient legend, the red rocks at Weston were once home to two evil-tempered giants Tarquin and Tarquinus, bitter enemies of Arthur and his knights. Indeed, various amateur historical sleuths and authors have presented some fairly convincing theories about the real historical facts behind the Arthurian legends having been played out in the area.

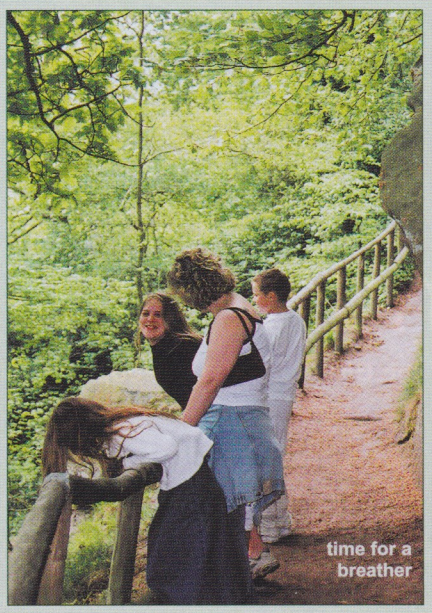

The ruins of Roman Uricon, modern Wroxeter, are only a few miles away, and recent excavations have unearthed evidence of a huge rebuilding programme in the middle of the 5th century - some forty years after the last Roman legionaries left Britain. Was this rebuilding part of the brief Romano-British revival made possible by Arthur the 'Dark Age' warlord?

Ancient history

The cliffs at Hawkstone themselves certainly felt the presence of the Romans. Some of the tunnels and caves were originally hewn out of the living rock by Roman copper miners - or more likely their British slaves. These ancient mines were probably what inspired Sir Rowland Hill, a late 18th Century landowner, to create what has been called "England's first theme park" - having twisting paths and stone steps carved out of the rock, and creating a variety of pseudo-antiquarian follies to amuse the visiting gentry as they enjoyed the new romantic fashion for wild landscapes.

Just how well he, his planners and his workmen succeeded may be gauged by the fact that the landscape,

The Memorial pillar, 152 steps up and down

time for a breather

Looking out through one of the caves

having been restored to award-winning status in the early 1990s, was used as the setting for the BBC TV Chronicles of Narnia series.

As you might expect from that, Hawkstone Park isn't a matter of tame well-manicured lawns and gentle pathways. Sadly it's totally unsuitable for the disabled or frail. Active children will love it though, dashing away to find out what's round the next corner. Even a fairly fit family needs at least three hours to go all the way around the trail, although provided the weather is good you'll want to spend far longer than that marvelling at the stunning views and the sheer natural beauty of the place.

Wild and beautiful

Nesting ravens and buzzards soar from craggy rocks, gnarled ancient oaks cling to the hillsides, deep green ferns and mosses luxuriate in dark clefts in the rocks. From the top of the 112-foot memorial pillar (152 steps up - and back down!) there are dizzying views over the fields and the winding river Severn to the distant hills of no fewer than thirteen counties on a clear day.

If you don't appreciate the natural beauty of this land of ours, then don't bother to visit Hawkstone. And don't expect anything for the kids to 'do', in the modern sense, as the ice-cream kiosk halfway round is as commercial as your day there will get. But even for children used to the country the scenery and sense of wild freedom here is enchanting, and those used to suburbs or tower blocks will find themselves in a world they might have thought exists only on TV or in far-away countries.

Hawkstone has been declared the only English Heritage Grade One Landscape in the country, and recently won the Heart of England Visitor Attraction of the Year Award. But you needn't take my word for it. Pick a dry, sunny day, pack a picnic and a small torch, put on some sensible shoes - and go and discover for yourself one of the magic corners of England.

Hawkstone Park and Follies, and the adjacent golf hotel and ornamental gardens, are just off the A49 between Shrewsbury and Whitchurch, and within easy reach of the Midlands M6 and the M54.(see map) Entry prices are £5..50 for adults, £3.50 for children, Seniors and students £4.50, Family (2 adults and up to three children under 16) £15

Our Land & Our People

Darren James, the co-ordinator of the BNP's Land and People rural affairs circle explains its priorities

Rural Britain is in turmoil, incomes are crashing and the young, priced out of the housing market and with little hope for their futures, are leaving the countryside in their droves. Great swathes of lush pastureland and precious wildlife habitats are succumbing to floods of development to house 'white-flight' refugees fleeing the folly of enforced multi-culturalism. Our farming and fisheries industries as a result of EU bureaucracy, government mishandling and 'cheap' foreign imports are facing extinction.

The British National Party's Land and People rural affairs circle has been created to raise awareness of the crisis in rural Britain and to introduce people in rural areas to the nationalist solutions to the problems they face. Our membership is drawn from party members in rural areas and those who feel particularly strongly about countryside issues in our towns and cities as well as individuals who are not BNP members.

There is a great as yet untapped well of dissatisfaction in rural Britain. This is usually wrongly interpreted as a 'towny versus country' problem. Westminster politicians have used the old Divide and Conquer - Order through Chaos method employed since time immemorial to assist their hidden agenda for the downfall of our nation's identity. No better example can be found than the attempts made to outlaw foxhunting and field sports. Whatever opinion you may have on this emotive issue I am sure we are all in agreement that it ranks low on the list of priorities for the regeneration of Great Britain. The reality of the situation is that the only divide is with the British people and the Westminster government not between country folk and city dwellers.

Land and People is pledged to bring about the revival of the fortunes of rural Britain and to work to preserve and enhance the delicate balance between our environment and its indigenous population.

We believe that it is high time the British people of the countryside learnt to say STOP!!!!

STOP! destroying our farming industry. A nation that forfeits the ability to feed its own people forfeits its independence. Our governments blinkered globalist fixation on our absorption into the federal state of the European Union is the key reason behind the relentless onslaught of scare stories and crises on our beleaguered farmers. The reality is our produce is already of the highest standard far higher in terms of human safety and degrees of animal husbandry than the nations vying to replace our produce from the Euro. expansion zones of Eastern Europe. Is it any wonder that so many of our farmers are listening to the siren calls of the developers.

STOP! building on our green fields. The great unspoken truth behind the great mass of building development in rural Britain is enforced multi-culturalism. Britons are escaping our crime infested cities, consciously or otherwise in order to escape the very worst that the politically correct lobby has to offer. In the meantime many acres of prime farmland and the delicate habitats of rare and endangered wildlife are disappearing daily under waves of concrete and tarmac .

Our key intention at Land & People is to show the people of this great island nation that the BNP is a party for Britain in its entirety: not just the tormented inner cities, but every town and village, every farm and fisherman's cottage. We believe that only the British National Party can awaken the 'Sleeping Giant' of British consciousness.

Through study and discussion of rural issues our role is to formulate BNP rural policy.

The Great British countryside at the current rate could soon be reduced to the level of second rate theme park with the very essence of why it was once found so appealing lost forever amid a rubbish strewn wasteland and bland characterless housing estates.

We at Land & People are aiming to harness the energies and anger of Middle Britain. We will be relentlessly pointing out the failures of the Lib/Lab/Con which is threatening our "living countryside". The political elite, beset by political correctness and control freakery will be resisted, our survival as a nation requires it.

Yours, for our land and its people

Dear Sirs,

I am a small businessman who has just recently joined the B.N.P as a family member and I would like to make a few observations if I may. We as a national party now represent a real threat to the well-established political system. This is why they spend so much time trying to rubbish us. Because we are formed of members of the British public who really care about "our" country because we see it as under threat.

Before joining the BNP, I had never joined a political party in my life. This was due to apathy to be honest; you know a belief that it wouldn't make any difference anyway. Well now I know I can make a difference, I can help to make my country a better place in which to live. The BNP is made for people like you and me : "ordinary people" who want to live in a better country, a better country for all citizens.

So how can we keep persuading more and more of our fellow British people to join us at a faster rate? Well we need to keep focusing on and improving our image. We have been the target for slander, abuse, name calling, even believe it or not police attention. Why? The answer is," that this is the only weapon the system has to fight us with." They think that if they blacken our image then the British people will not join us.

Well I have news for them. The tide is turning; the British people are joining us. However, the stronger we grow the more concerted the attacks will become, so we must be ready and become even more professional in the way we present ourselves.

I have spent 15 years training and running direct sales teams so I know from experience that we must all learn to look and act the part more consistently. This is very important for two reasons. Firstly, you will not be seen as a threat to anyone i.e. people will treat you differently and listen to you because you are smart. Secondly, you remove the image fabricated and planted by the media of mindless thugs.

You the membership can smash such an image to pieces in the eyes of the British people. It is up to you. I am new to the BNP. And I really want it to grow and become elected to run our Great Britain. So I challenge you the British National Party. This party will only be what we make it. We will get what we deserve.

Dear Sirs,

Is there a historical precedent for the taxpayers of a country being forced to finance a destructive invasion of their own country? I believe that is what is happening here.

In addition to the crippling expense of the upkeep, accommodation and legal aid of alleged asylum seekers and illegal immigrants, there is also the fact that TB and other illnesses, including sexually transmitted diseases, are increasing massively. It would be interesting to know how much of this is 'home grown' and how much of it is being brought in from overseas. Is it any wonder that our hospitals and other medical facilities are in danger of being overwhelmed?

Also, many of the people entering the country follow teachings which have no regard for equality. If you look at countries from the south of the Mediterranean down to the Equator, and in some cases further south, how much respect do you see for political correctness or human rights?

It is time that our politicians and the co-called 'elite' of the country removed their rose-tinted spectacles, came down from the ivory towers in which they appear to live and faced the realities of life on earth.

Mrs. Jordan
Preston

Dear Sirs,

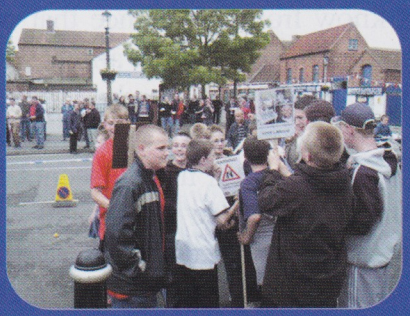

Firstly a big and very appreciative well done and congratulations to our three new councillors and everyone who was involved. Although we were vilified and railed against as 'Nazis' and 'right-wing thugs', we have proven not only to ourselves that we can win but more importantly we have shown a graceful face of honour in the front of extreme verbal and in some cases physical assault. This turning of the other cheek has done wonders for the party's image in the eyes of the public.

At last I can smell the first wafts of a new beginning where we are masters of our own country again, free of the Political Correctness brigade and all their thought police. The British people governing themselves, of themselves, and by themselves to paraphrase Lincoln. The winds of change are beginning to stir.

Local children, Parents and Grandparents came out to vent their anger at New Labour's plans

Opposing New Labour's asylum jihad

BNP leads biggest ever meeting against planned illegal immigrant centre

On June 6th, Nottingham BNP activists were at the forefront of the largest demonstration yet against the Blair government's plans to create scores of monster asylum seeker accommodation centres across the British countryside. One of these sites - the former RAF base at Newton in Nottinghamshire - is close to the small market town of Bingham where 1,500 local people gathered in peaceful patriotic protest against the illegal immigrant centre. The marketplace was awash with Union Flags and BNP placards as angry locals gathered to vent their fear and anger at a proposal that has seen property prices tumble in the area.

The event was shown on ITV Central News and BBC Local News, and the BNP also gained front-page coverage in two local papers the same evening.

Well done to all involved.

New Campaign Launched: How can you help get the Red Cross back on target

Our campaign leaflet

The leaders of the British Red Cross have outraged millions of decent Britons by supporting the Red Cross Asylum centre at Sangette, from which huge numbers of bogus 'refugees' gate-crash the Channel Tunnel.

The latest Red Cross annual report reveals that the charity helped more than 20,000 asylum seekers last year. Yet even the pro-immigration Government admits that the vast majority of these people have no right to be here, having passed through half-a-dozen safe countries where they could have claimed asylum - if they hadn't been so keen to get to Soft Touch Britain.

Even worse are the press reports about the Red Cross closing down its last residential homes for the disabled and pensioners - including war veterans - in order to save money, while declaring in an internal report that "Of all new services developed by the British Red Cross during 2001, around one in eight were for refugees and asylum seekers, showing that this is a priority."

The Daily Mail has urged its readers to boycott the Red Cross shops in order to protest against it encouraging the asylum flood which recent opinion polls show is opposed by 97% of people in Britain. That figure means that even many members of ethnic minorities oppose this new wave of immigration, confirming what the British National Party says that "It's a question of space, not of race."

The BNP doesn't want people to boycott the Red Cross because we don't want to see the good work it does suffer. But growing public anger against the Red Cross leadership has already led to a big drop in donations, so something needs to be done to make the Red Cross drop its pro-asylum bias.

So we're asking you to keep on supporting the local Red Cross charity shop, but to have a quiet word with the staff (who probably aren't happy either) the next time you go in to donate unwanted items or to buy something. Ask them politely to pass on your opposition to their bosses using your money to help encourage asylum spongers. You could also write to express your disgust to: The Red Cross, 9 Grosvenor Crescent, London SW1X 7EJ.

If enough of us complain, there's a chance that they'll get the message and go back to helping the genuinely needy - in Britain and in their own countries - rather than encouraging the economic migrants and criminals posing as asylum seekers.

EXCALIBUR MERCHANDISE

Excalibur is the cultural and historical merchandise service of the BNP, which sells a wide range of products inspired by the rich cultural heritage of our British ancestors. It offers a huge range of goods related to the history and culture of the British people, specialising in books on our Celtic, Anglo-Saxon, and Viking ancestors, and also selling everything from clothing to jewelry to music tapes and CDs. All the profits from British Heritage will go directly to the British National Party. All orders should be sent to: Excalibur, PO Box 16, York, YO61 3YH. Cheques/postal orders payable to 'Excalibur'. Please add sum in brackets for post and packing. All prices include VAT. Please give a phone or email contact with your order in case we need to contact you.
